Corruption Play

A Look Into Fantasies of Forced Changes

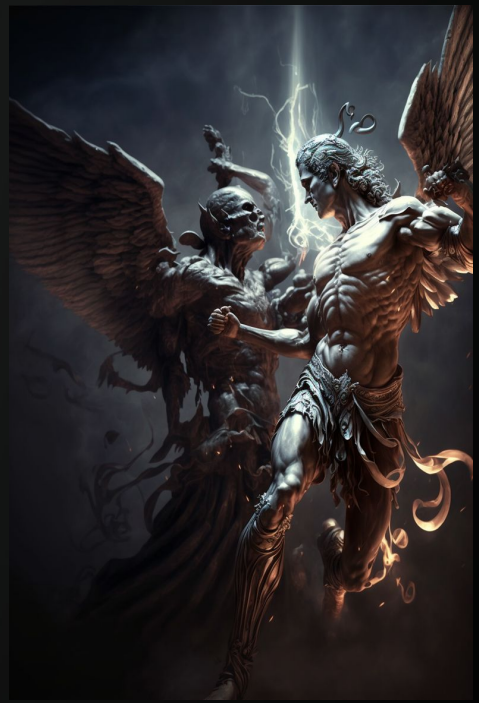

What This Class Will Teach You

- Corruption Play: What It Is, And How It Do
- What Corruption Play Is Not
- Corruption Play vs. Transformative Play: What's the Difference?
- Corruption Play vs. Corruptive Roleplay: What's the Difference?
- A New Acronym: The FRIES Model of Consent
- Applying the FRIES Model to Corruption Play

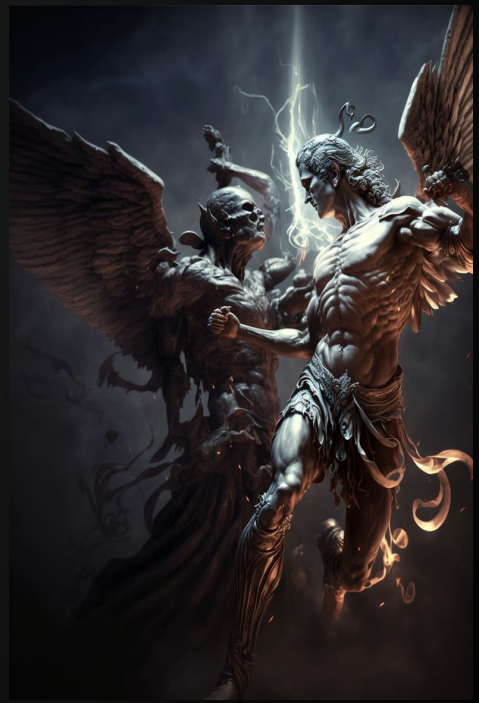

Corruption Play: What It Is, And How It Do

- Corruption Play is a form of kink play that focuses on the fantasy and thrill of watching a “no” become a “yes” within the context of a consensual scene.
- When applied to kink, it’s typically combined with roleplaying out a particular fantasy, and thus requires all of the standard protocols to help keep things within the realm of feasibility, safety, and consensual kink.
- The “no” is scripted; the “yes” is negotiated and consented to well in advance of the actual scene.

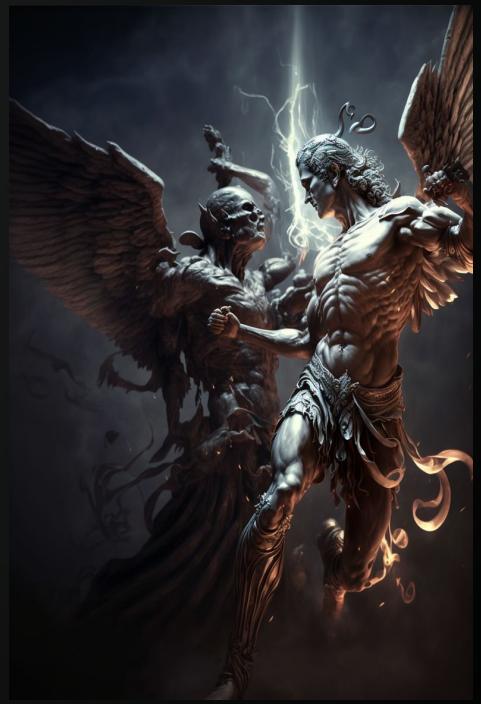

Corruption Play: What It Is, And How It Do

- To corrupt something is to induce a departure from the original or from what is pure or correct; this departure usually leads to an unwanted destination within a fantasy setting.
- The quintessential example of Corruption Play would be to roleplay the exchange of a devil corrupting an angel. It typically takes something from being in one state and forces it to change into something that’s against the original’s nature.

What Corruption Play Is Not

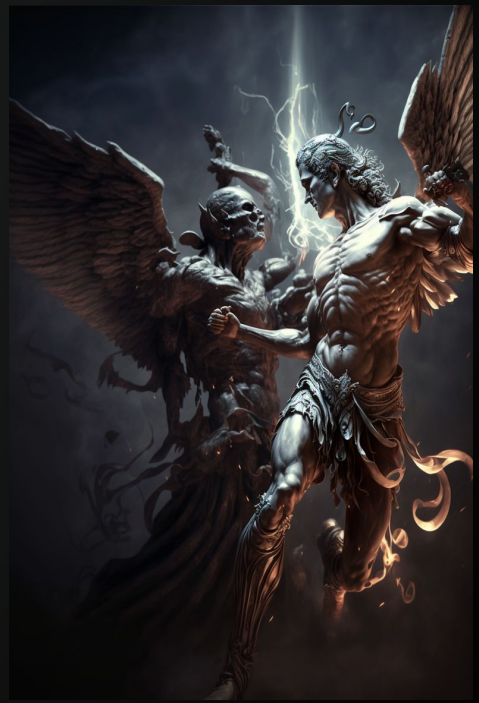

- Corruption Play is NOT actual coercion (i.e. non-consensual coercion) with extra steps.
- A prime example of the opposite of Corruption Play would be peer pressuring someone into doing something they'd normally not do.
- Like with all forms of kink, it's no longer kinky if it's not consensual. This leads to the high risk of abuse and possible trauma, among other negative outcomes.

Possible Consequences of Corruption Play

- Loss of self.
- Mental breakdown.
- Sensory overload.
- Altered patterns of behavior/emotions.
- Separation of close friends/groups in favor of the instigator.

- These risks may manifest overtime as opposed to during or immediately after the scene, and they could be temporary or long-term issues.
- For some, being able to be lost in a fantasy is a far better reality than the one they live with. This can really impact someone in very bad ways if not handled carefully.
- The loss of self and altered patterns of behaviors can lead to an unintentional creation of reliance on the instigator to give the subject guidance or purpose, a meaning to the instigator, and a reason to exist around them.
    - In essence, the subject can unintentionally become dependent on the instigator.
- Depending on how the corruption is instigated, the overwhelming of the senses during the scene can cause unnecessary suffering in the subject.
    - The misuse of hypnosis, strobe lighting, loud noises, sensory deprivation, or confinement can cause an overload of the senses if not handled carefully.
- The corruption process should be pleasurable or otherwise reasonably bearable until there's nothing left of the old self, rather than overwhelming to the point of burn-out.

Corruption Play vs. Transformative Play: What's the Difference?

- Transformative Play is similar to Corruption Play in that it involves a transformation of a subject from one form into another; the difference is that the transformation doesn't have to be forced. It could, in fact, be welcomed and desired by the subject.
- Transformative Play could be focused on the subject changing into a better version of what they are, or even into a desired alternative form altogether.
- What really differentiates whether something is Corruption Play or Transformative Play depends on the perspective of the participants, which may differ from the perspective of any onlookers if performed publicly.

Corruption Play vs. Corruptive Roleplay: What's the Difference?

- When Corruption Play disregards the usual stop words ("no, please stop!") and the corruption continues despite the subject's cries for it to stop, then it becomes a form of CNC Play.
- In essence, the scripted "no" is ignored and the "yes" is applied despite any scripted push-back.
  - NOTE: This assumes that the lack of stop words and the forced nature of the scene has been thoroughly negotiated and consented to. Safewords ALWAYS apply and should ALWAYS be respected!
  - Remember: CNC Play is about the illusion of violated consent; all of the safeguards of BDSM should be in place to mitigate the inherent risks as much as possible.

Corruption Play vs. Corruptive Roleplay: What's the Difference?

- Corruptive Roleplay is usually where instead of a "no" forcibly becoming a "yes," the subject is presented with "A or B" choices that mislead the subject towards their own corruption.
- At any point the subject can bring a halt to the corruptive transformation; the corruptor usually works to convince or tempt the subject into going further.
- This is NOT a form of CNC Play because this does not involve forcing the transformation when the subject says "no."
- Whilst the end result may be something that the subject doesn't want to become, such a realization isn't made until the end if done well enough.

New Acronym - The FRIES Model of Consent

- Freely given, with no pressure or fear to agree.
- Reversible, a safeword anytime.
- Informed, you both know the risks.
- Enthusiastic, willing rather than compliant.
- Specific, negotiated for the exact scene, not a vague umbrella.

Applying the FRIES Model to Corruption Play

- Freely Given: Consent shouldn't be coerced or pressured out of the subject.
- Reversible: Safewords ALWAYS apply, and a Red means the scene stops entirely.
- Informed: The "no" to "yes" transformation is thoroughly discussed, and the hard limits are spelled out clearly.
    - Don't forget to have a plan for when things go wrong!
- Enthusiastic: Nothing happens unless everyone involved is willing to engage.
- Specific: All of the details of the transformation are spelled out clearly, rather than just "winging it."

Open Discussion: Examples of Corruption Play

- Pure made impure.
- Good turned into evil.
- Clean made dirty.
- Lycanthropy.
- Hypno-Based Corruption Play.
- Regular person forced to become a Disney Adult.
- Someone bullied into buying a timeshare.

In Conclusion…

Corruption Play is an enticing form of forced transformative fantasy roleplay with the potential to delve into CNC territory if desired. Much like anything else, it requires planning, plenty of discussions and negotiations, and LOTS of good aftercare. But when handled properly, it can lead to the exploration of some amazing experiences with your trusted play partner!